Conventional Chinese Medicine utilizes a variety of basic principles which have been refined over thousands of years of medical practice. Among the major principles is that wellness is governed by the flow of qi or life force through the body. Medical complaints are said to be brought on by interruptions to this flow, as the body's energy balance becomes disrupted. Practitioners of Traditional Chinese Medicine believe that interruptions in the flow of qi affect certain organs and therefore; all indications can be related and traced back to a particular organ.

Qi follows an array of meridians, or major pathways as it flows throughout the body. Each and every meridian carries qi in various ways to different organs. When an Acupressure practitioner identifies a problem, they know particularly what meridian is affected. The meridians of the body are broken up into a detailed series of stress points. These points are physically manipulated to treat various symptoms. These pressure points are found by finding the meridian and utilizing particular parts of the body as landmarks.

Normally, in an Acupressure session, the customer lies upon a table draped with a sheet or blankets. Some Acupressure practitioners ask the customer to undress, while others work with clothed customers. When the session is blended with Western massage techniques, undressing is more common, even though, no massage therapist would ask the client to go past their comfort level. Throughout the session, the practitioner normally takes a few quick passes over the customer so as to familiarize themselves with the customer, while asking regarding particular issues she or he is going through.

The Acupressure therapist then makes use of various degrees of pressure on certain pressure points on the body. Based on the needs of the client and the preferences of the practitioner, hands, elbows and even some tools can be utilized in order to apply a certain amount of pressure. The flow of the patient's qi is supposed to even out over the course of the treatment, and hopefully, relief is brought to the symptoms that the customer has mentioned. These sessions could be really energizing and likewise therapeutic, usually the patient goes through a flood of emotion.
